The admiration of the Greeks for bodily perfection is shown by the great popularity of athletic festivals, particularly the one held every four years at Olympia, in the north-west of southern Greece. Competitors had to come early to Olympia, and after proving to the judges that they were of genuine Greek birth on both sides, they were put through a period of official training. The games lasted five days and took place on a plain between two rivers, watched by wildly-excited spectators from great embankments. The first day the chariot and horse races took place, very expensive forms of sports in which only the rich could afford to compete. Then in a separate enclosure, a little over two hundred yards long, were held various foot races. Our word "stadium" is taken from the Greek word for this distance. The other events were the long jump, throwing the discus, throwing the javelin, wrestling, and boxing. The prize won at the games was simply a wreath of wild olive leaves; but your city would honour you with privileges, and you would become a famous man in all Greece.

Questions:

- a. What were the Olympic sports?
- b. Who could take part in them?
- c. What were the events of the first day?
- d. Name some other events.
- e. What is the origin of the word 'stadium'?
